The Old Vanderburgh County Courthouse is a baroque style building of Indiana Limestone. Since it was sand-blasted and pointed about eight years ago, it is in excellent condition, particularly the exterior. The interior has been well but not beautifully maintained and would require some repairs to plaster ceilings and refinishing of woodwork and walls. It was, however, used until May, 1969 as the seat of County Government and is in quite habitable condition.

Designed by Henry Wolters of Louisville, Kentucky, the Courthouse is symetrically balanced in the classic sense. The main building is a long, rectangular structure with a broad pavillion projecting perpendicularly from each of the long sides, with a soaring dome erected on the roof at the crossing point of the pavillions and the axis of the main building. The decoration is in symetrically organized patterns of high complexity, rusticated stones alternating with smooth ones. At the third story level are cartouche type windows surrounded by elaborate scroll designs. Along the cornice-line a marble balustrade railing encircles the entire building, interrupted only by segmental pediments placed one at each end of the main building and capped by over-life sized_statuary by Franz Engelsmann, a pupil of Augustus St. Gaudens. Four bulging bays located near the corners of the structure are topped by hemispherical domes which emphasize the symetrical balance and call attention to the doorways, which are approached by long, imposing stairs.

The interior of the building is paved with marble in the principal hallways and the walls of the main and second floors are lined with Tennessee marble panels. Elaborate ironwork guard rails are a feature of the Rotunda on each floor and the-stair rails are of wrought iron as well. The central dome of the Rotunda rises to a coffered, rounded ceiling visible from below from all three floors. The Rotunda has on each floor niches and lunettes which it has been proposed that local artists treat with sculptures and murals. There are several large court rooms going through two floors, with handsome baroque plaster ceilings and wall decorations. The original judge's benches, jury boxes and railings of carved walnut are still in place. The interior construction of the upper portion of the dome rising above the clock mechanism is a masterpiece of the bricklayer's art, with bricks baked to order, rounded to fit into the curved surfaces of the dome. The brickwork is supported by a spider-web-like framework of bent iron bars. basement and foundations are extremely massive, with limestone chunks 5 x 5 feet square, still showing drill marks where they were blasted out of the quarry. A tunnel leads under 4th Street to the County Jail across the street and also conducts the heating pipes from the power plant behind the Jail building.
